What's New - Version 5.1.0: - Updated to fix a compatibility issue with an old version of Windows. - Update Chinese translation A couple of days ago I ran into a problem I'd never heard of before: the Windows 7 operating system (and not just one instance, but all of them) had become unreachable from the Internet. The router was fine, I could still see all the other computers on the network. But my own machine was invisible to the world. Not just that, all of my internet-enabled programs (including Internet Explorer, Firefox, Google Chrome and so on) couldn't connect to the Internet anymore. All I could do was to type my network password. That usually connects me to the local network, but that's no help. It turns out that the Windows 7 operating system was somehow in a bad state: I hadn't shut it down properly after updating Windows 7 two days ago. It had failed to shut down properly and had remained in a "sleep" state. It was showing the blue screen of death with the error code 0xc0000135 (0xc0007d00). I found the solution on several websites (here, here, here, and here) and from the Microsoft website. It was rather simple, but I still had to experiment a bit to find out what to do. Luckily, I found a detailed description of this problem on Microsoft's official forums and

What's New In Multi Password Recovery Portable?

A portable version of the Multi Password Recovery software. It can be used to restore passwords for various programs that support the Winlogon MAPI (MS Outlook, Gmail, SeaMonkey) module. NetInfo is a new free utility designed to help you keep track of information about your Internet connection. If you're not sure whether you have a DSL or cable Internet connection, or if your Internet connection is WLAN or a cellular modem, NetInfo can help you find out. It can display the current connection speed, the connection method (DSL, cable, cellular, WiFi, etc.), the IP address and MAC address of the router, the Internet Service Provider, and the ISP assigned name. It can also display the name of your access point or WiFi router and display the name of the country your connection is in. You can display a graphical or textual representation of the connection speed (Kbit/s), a graphic representation of the connection method, the IP address, the connection type (DSL, cable, WiFi, etc.), the name of the access point (router), and the name of the country (and other information about the access point). If you have more than one Internet connection, it can also display the name of the last-used connection. NetInfo also displays the signal strength of your local Wi-Fi and cellular connections, or you can use a graphical representation to see how strong or weak the signal is in your current location. It displays the name of the last-used cellular phone (for GSM or UMTS), SMS or MMS connection. NetInfo can display the details about your Internet connection from a file, an Internet connection explorer, a URL, a proxy, or even from a mobile phone. NetInfo uses a configuration file that can be created or modified on your desktop. It contains the name of the information you want to display, and it will automatically detect any change made to the configuration file.
